Director: it's a Saturday afternoon. Jake, Amy and Mac are in the living room playing a board game (Uno) while Jamie has taken Ellie to the park across the street, like he's done hundreds of times before.

Narrator: Narrator: The living room coffee table is currently the site of a high-stakes tactical conflict. Sunlight streams through the front window, illuminating a scattered pile of colorful Uno cards, a notebook where Amy has been meticulously tracking win-loss ratios for three years, and three very intense Peraltas sitting cross-legged on the rug. Just down the block, Jamie is pushing four-year-old Ellie on the low swings at the park—a routine weekend escape he's mastered to avoid the fallout of family game night.

Amy: She adjusts her hand of cards into perfect color-coded alignment. "Jake, you can't play a wild card on top of another wild card without calling the color first. That is literally written on the back of the instruction booklet, which I laminated for this exact reason."

Jake: He places his hand dramatically over his heart. "Ames, please. Rules are just suggestions made by people who didn't have the vision to see a blue draw-two coming. Besides, I am playing with gut instinct today. The gut doesn't follow instructions—it operates on pure, raw instinct and light snack consumption."

Mac: He casually drops a red Draw onto the discard pile. "That's great, Dad, truly inspiring speech. Now draw four cards and pass your turn to Mom."

Jake: He gasps and stares at the card in betrayal. "My own flesh and blood. My second-favorite son in this room right now."

Mac: He grins and leans back against the sofa. "Smartest move Jamie ever made was taking Ellie to the park before we pulled out the deck. He knew this floor was going to turn into a war zone by two o'clock."

Amy: She glances toward the window with a soft smile before zeroing back in on the card deck. "Jamie is responsible. He knows she needs to burn off her afternoon energy before nap time. Now, Mac, play your turn so I can legally crush your father's hopes of a comeback."

Director: The front door bangs open violently, nearly flying off of the hinges. Jamie sprints in, breathing heavily. There's no Ellie. He can't speak, struggling to catch his breath.

Narrator: Narrator: The front door slams open with a deafening crash, bouncing violently against the wall and nearly ripping from its hinges. The peaceful weekend atmosphere shatters in an instant. Cards scatter across the rug as Jake, Amy, and Mac jump to their feet.

Saturday: He stumbles into the living room, gripping the edge of the hallway wall to keep from falling. "She: Mom —"

Narrator: He: He is completely alone. Chest heaving violently, his breath comes in sharp, ragged gasps that cut off his words before he can finish a full sentence. Sweat clings to his forehead, his face drained of all color, his eyes wide with unadulterated panic.

Amy: She drops her hand of cards onto the table, crossing the room before the paper even hits the rug.
"Jamie?: breathe. Look at me, sweetie. Take a deep breath. Where is Ellie?"

Jake: He moves in right behind her, his easygoing demeanor vanishing in a split second as his voice drops into sharp focus. "Hey, buddy, slow down. You're hyperventilating. Look at me — deep breath in. Talk to us. What happened?"

Mac: He steps past the coffee table, his eyes darting past his brother out the open front doorway toward the street. "Jamie... where's Ellie? Why didn't she come in with you?"
